

that word "fired." The picture was finished, anyway.

Todd married Liz three days after her divorce from Michael Wilding came through.

Todd and McClory remained friends, as always. But Todd never lost an almost imperceptible edge in his manner towards Kevin.

Last year—the last time he came to London—Todd and his wife, Liz, were staying at the Dorchester Hotel, when Kevin and I wandered in to say hullo.

Todd greeted Kevin with a quiet grin, and then shouted into the bedroom to Liz: "Mama—get up! Your boy friend's here."

Romance

only sixteen, Kevin treated her more or less as a pretty schoolgirl.

When he flew from Nassau to New York, to prepare his globe-circling trip, Bobo came sadly to the airport to see him off.

Money

WHEN Kevin and Todd parted company, Kevin took himself off for a holiday in Nassau, the millionaires' playground.

He already had millionaire tastes. All he needed was the money.

His visit to Nassau was the turning point in his life. This was where the real gold began to glitter in the distance for the globe-trotting Irish lad.

He had heard of the lost treasure of King Philip IV, sunk in a Spanish ship off the islet of Gorda Cay. And he had decided to seek it, and make a film about the search.

But such a film costs big money. Kevin didn't have that sort of money. Nor could he raise it.

And an American advertising agency had already put up to him a proposition for going round the world again, by car, to make a commercial documentary film.

Kevin decided to do that. But before he left Nassau he met a young girl called Frederica Sigris, known in her family as "Bobo." Bobo was an heiress to millions. Since she was

Met

KEVIN told Bryce about another film he had in mind—"The Boy and the Bridge."

The upshot was that Bryce went into partnership with Kevin—Bryce's money and Kevin's know-how—to make the film.

Before Kevin set off for London to prepare the film he played a game of golf at Nassau. On the golf links he chanced to meet Mrs. Beatrice Sigris, Bobo's mother.

It was a fateful meeting. Kevin had been keeping away from Bobo. But Mrs. Sigris invited him back to the house.

Before Kevin climbed aboard the plane for London he and Bobo had become very close friends. Bobo Sigris later came